

“Civil rights organizations have for years been warning about predatory lending and subprime mortgages that target communities of color, communities that often don’t have access to traditional lending institutions. We want to prevent this from happening again by evicting discrimination from our communities. We want a nation that is committed to integrated neighborhoods, an increase in the availability of affordable housing and a regulated lending environment in which people can borrow without sorrow.”

“Fair housing for everyone is at the heart of a democratic and equitable society. Yet there is still resistance to the idea that people with disabilities should be integrated within our communities, in part because of HUD’s policies and regulations that perpetuate segregated and isolating housing patterns. An independent agency would benefit people with disabilities, people of color and the nation by allowing and providing for fair housing opportunities for people with disabilities in an affordable, accessible and integrated manner.”

- I. King Jordan

“Fair housing is essential to our national health and prosperity. That’s why we need a regional approach to fair housing to look not just at one neighborhood but how a whole region works together. An independent fair housing agency that can look at fair housing on many levels, including the regional level, is the only way we’re going to get there.”

- Myron Orfield

“We need to put discriminatory housing practices under a microscope and make sure they are not only enforced but that diverse housing practices are encouraged. Our cities are stronger when our neighborhoods are diverse and inclusive. Establishing a fair housing enforcer, one that is independent from the agency funding the cities’ housing programs, will give cities the tools and incentives they need to crack down on fair housing violations.”

“For the better part of this year, the commission traveled around the country holding public hearings in Chicago, Los Angeles, Atlanta, Boston and Houston. What they found was as more disturbing than expected. The hearings drew hundreds of housing advocates and residents who testified to the pervasive nature and extent of illegal housing discrimination and its connections to government policy and practice that affect communities across the nation.”

“The findings of the National Commission on Fair Housing and Equal Opportunity come forty years after the passage of the Fair Housing Act and carefully detail the entrenched residential segregation and widespread housing discrimination that continue in this country. The Commission’s report cries out for a renewed commitment to fair housing and fair lending by government at all levels and by the private housing industry. I urge the new Administration to make such a renewed commitment and start by giving full consideration to the important recommendations in this report.”

– Lawyers’ Committee for Civil Rights Under Law Executive Director Barbara Arnwine

“In these times of economic crisis, housing issues must be at the forefront of our quest for true equality, and this important report is a critically needed review of the forces that keep our communities segregated, with devastating costs in education, employment and health care. We extend our appreciation to the commissioners and all participants in the process. The proposals for reform should be supported by all necessary players and adopted in full.”

– NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc. President and Director-Counsel John Payton

“Forty years after the Fair Housing Act, the Commission has presented us with a unique opportunity to re-examine whether our government is doing all it can to advance fair housing, integration, and equal opportunity. In the context of our housing and economic crisis, the Commission’s report reflects on our government’s role in the continuing state of housing inequality and the reforms necessary to ensure its vigorous enforcement of the law so that we can move towards stable, diverse and inclusive neighborhoods.”

– National Fair Housing Alliance President Shanna Smith
